

Derivatives with Emotive Connotation in English and Tatar: Present State and Development Perspectives

G.Gimaletdinova

Kazan State University (Russia, Kazan)

Summary. Investigation of words with emotive connotation is becoming more important and interesting with the growing role of a human being in all spheres of life. This cannot but affect linguistic studies. The presentation examines some up-to-date changes in the functioning of emotive words (noun derivatives) in English and Tatar. We will try to see how suffixes can help speakers express their opinions of somebody/ something affecting the recipient (another speaker or reader) in a certain way. Special attention will be paid to the necessity of including the problems of modern word-formation into the curricula of stylistics and lexicology as academic studies. Scientific investigations in the field of suffixation and other means of word building certainly improve language learning and reveal adequate culture perception.