Kazan Golovkinsky Stratigraphic Meeting, 2019

Sedimentary Earth Systems: Stratigraphy, Geochronology, Petroleum Resources and

Fifth All-Russian Conference “Upper Paleozoic of Russia”

September 24-28, 2019, Kazan, Russia

The sedimentary basins of the past are represented by a very broad range of facies. The evolution of these facies reflects major geographical, climatic, and biospheric changes. Professor Nikolai A. Golovkinsky (1834–1897), a founder of the Kazan geological school and the author of fundamental studies on the geology and stratigraphy of Eastern Europe, was one of the first geologists to recognize the empirical rules of sedimentary succession and the lateral diachroneity of facies in sedimentary basins (Golovkinsky-Walther’s Law), which was a prototype of the modern concept of sequence stratigraphy.

Sedimentary basins are associated with various mineral deposits. The understanding of depositional processes and settings combined with the interpretation of the evolution of organisms and landscapes are very important for the interpretation of current changes in environments, climate and future forecasting. Multidisciplinary studies of biotic and abiotic factors that led to recurrent changes in marine and continental ecosystems can be widely used by various disciplines of science and technology.
